Thank you, GabyThe US and France have both been at the forefront of the European strategy of containment and regional isolation during the Syria crisis, with the US military sending anti-ship missiles against warships near Tartus, while French warplanes have dropped bombs on the outskirts of Damascus. One of the most interesting developments has been the sudden intensification of cooperation by Iran and Russia to defend Syria's critical oil pipelines, although both countries also have the responsibility for military action against Damascus.

It is possible, however, that the situation will only become more difficult if the Assad regime uses chemical weapons on its own people with no coordination, thus ensuring a war crime trial. This has already happened twice in the past few months, when chemical weapons were used, killing hundreds and the country's own witnesses claiming they experienced first-hand the effects. The use of such weapons by the Syrian government, regardless of who it is or which faction it represents, is abhorrent and has to be opposed to. If this were to happen again, President Assad would no doubt use chemical weapons on the people of one of its cities at gunpoint.. It may be too late to stop the Assad government's aggression against the people, but one thing all sides can agree on, is that the war has cost too much in blood and suffering, with more than 250,000 killed.
